369726	Tree(S) (Mesolithic) - (Neolithic), Wood Product Site (18th Century)	Torwood Mire	During the watching brief, conducted between November 2012 and July 2013, a spread of large oak logs with axe-dressed ends was recorded and sampled. As Torwood Mire lies within an area of significant later prehistoric settlement, it was initially thought that the working of the bog oaks might be related to activity on one of the nearby sites. Dendrochronological analysis of the oak assemblage produced two floating tree-ring chronologies which were subsequently dated by radiocarbon to the Mesolithic and Neolithic periods, while the wide-bladed metal axe marks on some of the oak logs could date to any time from the Roman Iron Age to the early modern period. 45770	Lithic Implement(S) (Stone)	Woodend Loch	The area of any discoveries is covered by a loch marginal length of about 100 x 10 yds - the central portion ('A') being about 250 yds east of the Woodland strip. The possibility that the artifacts may have been washed down from a settlement on the southern exposure of the hill overlooking the loch cannot be disregarded. Artefacts were found, over a period of years, by Davidson - they are in various shades of flint, brown, green and black chert and mudstone. They comprise core and blade tools of Upper Palaeolithic aspect, with a large number of fragmented tools (fragmentation is a feature common to Upper Palaeolithic sites where flint is scarce). Also flakes, blades and scrapers, comparable with Mesolithic littoral type of the Hiberno-Scottish province - a Larne pick, and tanged flakes similar to NE Ireland early Larnian, Mesolithic prototype. A tranchet (comparable with Irish Littoral Early Neolithic artifacts) and an end scraper with a re-touched butt-end (a feature akin to tools of the same series). Microliths (including 3 of Upper Palaeolithic style) comparable with the Tardenoisian Culture. Micro-burns and notched flakes (associated with advanced British Tardenoisian). Total of definable artifacts 385. Miscellaneous waste (chips, flake, struck pebble fragments) 386.	Unknown	NS 707 669

185658	Farmstead (Period Unassigned) (Possible)	'Linnygate', Greengairs	The site consisted of the remains of a single building set on a low outcrop of sandstone bedrock which had provided the materials for the construction of the settlement. Remnants of a drystone wall along the edge of the rock outcrop suggest that the settlement had been contained within an enclosure. Exploratory trenching revealed that the surviving building, which stood to a maximum height of 0.65m at its W end, comprised two ground-floor rooms, the W chamber being roughly 3m square. Nothing remained of the E end of the building. The only pre-20th-century artefact recovered from the site is a sherd of tin-glazed pottery.	Unknown	NS 7720 7105
218994	Canal Lift (21st Century)	Falkirk, Lime Road, Millennium Wheel	In 2001 the Falkirk Wheel opened as part of the Millennium Link, re-establishing the connection between the Union and the Forth and Clyde Canals. It consists of a rotating wheel, which carries two cassions (gondolas) between the higher, Union Canal, to the Forth and Clyde Canal below. Construction required an extension to the Union Canal, which included an underground tunnel in order to avoid damaging the nearby Antonine Wall. The wheel was the first structure of its kind in the world.	21st century	NS 85241 80134

They can still be identified.	19th century	NS 8508 5711
362638	Farmstead (Post Medieval)	Holhills, Airdrie, Holhills Farmstead	The asset consists of Holehills Farmstead that is first depicted on the Ordnance Survey map of 1859 as a long rectangular range set within a triangular enclosure. The farmstead is then depicted on all subsequent Ordnance Survey map editions. From assessing aerial photographs of the area, it can be seen that the farmstead still survives and is in private use. Very little has changed of the original farmstead with several small modern additions.	Post Medieval	NS 76960 66874
362624	Farmstead (Post Medieval)	Airdrie, Thrushbush Farmstead	The asset consists of the former location of Thrushbush Farmstead, North which is depicted and annotated on the Ordnance Survey map of 1859. The structures that make up the farmstead are depicted as three long rectangular ranges set within three enclosures. The farmstead is depicted on subsequent maps up until 1962; however, the area is now occupied by a large modern housing development.	Post Medieval	NS 76449 67098
